Divorce Lawyer in Richmond - The different levels in the BC court system would each handle separate aspects of family law.

Both the Supreme Court and the Provincial Family Court, interim orders for custody, access and child support can be acquired. Typically, these orders are acquired at the onset of the case, while remaining active until the proceedings have ended. Frequently, an interim order is awarded for the father or mother to have complete ownership of a specific family asset. Therefore, the individual is ordered to either maintain possession of it or to sell the possession.

Unfortunately, even with all the efforts being made by the Provincial Family Court and the Supreme court, family cases still take several months to end.
